THE TRAMP'S REVENGE.

His Life Paid the Penalty of His Crime.

SARMER LES-LIE sat smoking in his doorway in the most contented frame of mind possible to a man, for he was at that moment basking in the warm sunshine of prosperity. great content, no chord of his higher nature was touched. As far as the eye could see the hills and the flocks on the hills were his The excellent woman attending to his corporeal comfort within the dwelling was his. The bright girl sewing at an upper window and the handsome boy galloping along the valley on his new pony were his children. The great barn filled with harvested grain was his. He did not look up and claim the sky, but all else about him was of value as a part of his domain. "Me and mine" was the refrain of his

At that moment something came around the corner of the house that did not belong to him, and it gave him a shock-a very disagreeable thrill, that was mostly disgust, and no quality of fear in it. The something was a tramp. The name is synonymous with obloquy, and this specimen did not belie the name. He shivered in the sun-light as if he had the ague. His rags stood out like splinters of distress, telling of a long friction with time. His limbs hadethat flaceid, relaxed motion which is tpyical of the drunken vagabond. His eyes were bloodshot. The only redeeming features were his voice, which was unusical and pathetic, and his manner, which was that of a man who had not always tramped the thoroughfares of the world.

"Sir," he said, touching the rim of a to give me a bite to eat-I am very hungry!"

One would suppose that sitting there in the sunlight of his own happiness Farmer Leslie, the properous man would have given a generous meal to this off-scouring of humanity-but he did nothing of the kind. "Be off," he said, "or I'll set the dog

"I will work-" began the tramp. "Oh, you will? I don't need your help. I have men to work for me, and not such eattle as you."

Ah, it cut to the quick, as he intendthe following: norming in time to connect with all the pri normal lines for the east, ed it should. The tramp made a sav-s ode that was transpeted at his back door when his good wife, who had overheaved the diplorue, handed out some breakl and meatine the tramp.

No. Farmer Leslie knew nothing of that. He was watching a speck far down in the valley that was a whole world to him, has boy galloping from about farmhouse to farmbouse, where his playfellows lived, showing them his new possession, the pony his father had Detroit Free Press. given him for a birt hday present.

Farmer Leslie did have soft spots in his heart, but as I have said, they were for "me and mine." Me gase no further thought to the wretched, disheartened man he had repulsed. Heddid not stop to gently scan his brothermann, and he did not believe that to step aside is human. So he put/the object out of his mind and gave himself up to the wear big boots"

"Cattle! Curse him! What is he? I'd like to make him suffer—yes. I would. Oh, I could die happy just to see that man in my place."

He lay and watched the man he hated, but he divided his attention. His bloodshot agonized eyes were fixed now on the splendid barn that had cost the farmer so many thousands of dol-lars, and was the pride of the surround-ing country. The fellow writhed with impatience.
"I hope he'll read the writing on the wall, and recognize the tramp's hand. I hope he'll—ha—it's working!" He saw a thin spiral of smoke rising like a crooked forefinger from the roof of the barn. The farmer sitting now

The tramp watched it and smiled as Cain might have smiled when he slew Abel. He gesticulated fiercely as if to sustain himself in some awful deed; then another look came into his face as he saw a boy ride gayly up to the barn, turn his horse loose, and carrying the saddle on his arm, disappear in side.

with his back turned did not see it.

One-two-three minutes passed Nothing had changed except the aspect of that thin spiral of smoke. It was now a column cut off from the roof by a blaze that the sunlight shielded Farmer Leslie was asleep in his chair.

The tramp rose to his feet. His expression and the evil purpose that had ossessed him changed to a look of disreputable virtue. His form expanded and grew taller, but he stood as if rooted to the hills.

Farmer Leslie was aroused now. His wife and daughter were running here and there, shricking fire, and he was wildly calling for help, to which summons his men working in the field responded. But there was no help that could save the smoldering mass, and no man that could enter that fiery fur-"Let it burn," shouted the farmer:

'thank God, we are all here." And at that moment his eye fell on his son's pony grazing in the field near

"Alfred!" he shouted. "Is he in the ouse? Where is Alfred?" A man darted past him and disappeared in that seething mass of flame and smoke. The group paid no attention to him, but ran distractedly about, calling the name of the boy who was the pride of their lives. Then there was a cry from within, a smothered cry, taken up and reechoed by those outside as they recognized his or die with him." But they could see the shadow of a man who walked like Shadrach of old in the fiery farmace, but unlike him there was the smell of fire on his garments and if the Saviour of walked with him, their eves were hidden that they could not see. He carried a burden that he had covered with his tattered coat. 'The fire fought for him and wound itstlong tendrils around him. It put out the light in those bloodshot eyes forever. He was literally blazing when he gathered up the last remnant of his strength, and threw his burden to those who met him half way. Then there was a roar and a crash, and never hadiman a more magnificent funeral pyre than this would have made. But he stumbled just outside, and a fallen beam pinned him to

PERSONAL AND LITERARY.

-Justice Blatchford's wealth was partly inherited. His father once lost $50,000, it is related, having set a valise containing that amount down in Fulton street. New York, to buy some peanuts and gone off forgetting it. But he was so wealthy that the loss did not hurt him much.

-Sir Leonard Tilley completed two years ago his second term as lieuten ant-governor of New Brunswick and he is still serving because partisan politics there is very bitter and the government has avoided the danger of exciting the animosity of one faction by failing to select his successor. -Mrs. Frederika Macdonald, a well-known English writer and lecturer, and Mrs. Annie Besant, who holds Mme. Blavatsky's scepter, engaged in a public disputation in London recently about the merits of theosophy and Buddhism. The debate resulted in a drawn battle, but was most interesting to the audience, as each disputant made an animated argument to support her thesis.

-Pierre Loti, who is about to start out on a tour to Egypt and Palestine, appears to be a great favorite with some of the feminine readers of his stories. In a lecture which she lately delivered about the novelist, Mme. The nard said that "at receptions they over whelmed him with adulation, and had he partaken of all the ices and wines they pressed on him he would have died

-It is the distinction of Rev. Mr. Blodgett, of Greenwich, Mass., that during his long pastorate of the village church there he has buried more people than the town contains. He has officiated at 624 funerals, while the entire population of Greenwich at the present time is only about 570. Mr. Blodgett is seventy-eight years old, and for half a century he has been the town's only elergyman.

-There were great rejoicings among the pupils of M. Benjamin Constant upon his election to a membership in the French academy. A reception was given him at one studio by the men here and a triumphal arch of roses and laurels was erected by his girl pupils in his studio in the Passage des Panoramas. Besides this, the staircase to the street was lined with young girls, each of whom held aloft a long spray of flowers or a palm branch as the painter descended, forming a floral canopy over his head.

-The prince of Wales not long ago was one of a large house-party, his host being a very well-known peer. After dinner, the royal guest, the host, and the other male visitors repaired to the billard-room. On a table at the side were two or three boxes of ciones. and the prince was helping himself to one, when an ambitious millionaire approached him, and taking from hi pocket a cigar-case, held it out to the prince, saying: "I think, sir, you will find these better." "Mr. ---," replied the prince, "if a man's dinner is good enough for me, his cigars are good enough for me." The millionaire was unex pectedly called away to town next morning on business.
